Thrombocytosis is a frequent occurrence in patients with nasopharyngeal carcinoma (NPC). While large platelet counts are often associated with thrombotic complications and a poor outcome, little is known about the precise mechanism of excessive platelet production. This study was conducted to investigate the hematological characteristics of unusual thrombocytosis in NPC patients. Whole blood from 110 NPC patients was analyzed for absolute platelet counts, and their relation to other hematological parameters was investigated. Thrombocytosis was evident in nine of these patients, with a platelet count ranging from  $517 \times 10^3$  to  $1\,367 \times 10^3$  per microl. Moreover, the platelet counts were  $\geq 400 \times 10^3$  per microl in only 2 of these nine patients. These nine patients had no history of thrombosis or evidence of coagulopathy; however, their white blood cell counts and/or serum levels of calcium and/or parathormone were higher than the normal range in five of the patients. In conclusion, unusual thrombocytosis is
